

Company Name,

I was very excited to see company's UI/UX Designer opening on Dribbble and I would appreciate being considered for the role. I have been working for several years in a product design and development and believe I can not only perform the responsibilities required of such a role, but execute them at an exemplary level.

I went to college, initially for illustration and writing (storyboarding), but changed focus to branding design, for which I graduated a degree with. Shortly after, I taught myself web development and design. My varied background not only showcases my diverse skillset, but my ability to grow and adapt to whatever challenges and opportunities are presented.

As a UI/UX designer, I know full-well how to implement, from the ground up, eye-catching interfaces and a sophisticated, modern user experiences—mockups, prototypes, styleguides, and wireframes are second nature. My background in branding, illustration, and development, though, have given my work a perspective that most in my field do not have: it is inherently built atop the guidelines of a brand and within the framework of the underlying code. In my experience, this perspective has given me the ability to produce high-quality, cohesive work that executives expect and engineering, design, and marketing teams love to see.

With that said, I believe my skillset most emphatically aligns with the requirements of this job opening. I would appreciate the chance to discuss my candidacy in further detail.

Thanks for your time,

A handwritten signature in black ink, reading "Gemma O'Brien". The signature is fluid and cursive, with the first name "Gemma" being more prominent and the last name "O'Brien" following in a similar style.

Josh Martin